There is no right or wrong way to render this portrait, but following these tips may help you succeed in getting realistic results.

First, identify and apply your darkest colors. Defining the details now will make sure they will not get lost and will help you establish the overall tone of the piece.

Next, lay down your mid-tones, leaving your brightest areas the color of the paper.

Trust what you see, even if at times it doesn't make sense, following the abstract patterns will translate to believable leaves and hair.

Now, go in with your lightest colors and blend as you layer. Using a blender pencil can also help fill in the tooth of the paper. A white pencil will help make the highlights pop.

Last, go over all your areas again, darkening areas and deepening tones. This will not only blend all your layers, but it can make all the difference in the end results. Good luck, and have fun!

I created these Grizaye kits after being frustrated with the planning process. Every time I felt the urge to draw and had a few spare hours, I would always run out of time and never get to the art part.

I could spend hours just researching what I wanted to draw, and then would still have to compose, photograph, and edit the image. By the time I created sketches and transferred them to my art paper, I would lose interest, and/or my window of opportunity would be closed.

If you are a working artist this is part of what you do, but for me, there are times I just need to satisfy my desire to draw something beautiful without all the pre-work. I enjoy having a project to work on while I hone my rendering & color selection skills.

An underpainting was the perfect solution! If I, who am very rusty with my work, can produce results like this - I know you can do the same or better! It is so much fun you will want to try out our other kits and see why this is fast becoming so popular.
